

THE EMBALMING PROCESS

The most common procedure during the 19th century embalming process was to use a mixture of formaldehyde and water to preserve the body. This mixture was injected into the body through the arteries and veins, and the body was then placed in a coffin. The process was often performed by a family member or a friend of the deceased, and it was a very important part of the funeral process.

The embalming process was a very important part of the funeral process, and it was often performed by a family member or a friend of the deceased. The process was often performed in a room that was set up for the purpose, and it was a very important part of the funeral process.
