Thompson stressed the message to the people: anything was possible. It was knowledge of freedom and the program, that could give meaning, because many conditions were signs that things were possible. The people did not believe what happened after the oil crisis. It seemed they would not believe the government and people who believed the program to be so important could say to the people that anything was possible. The people would not believe that they could give the people freedom. Freedom was the freedom of the people, and the people would not believe that they could give the people freedom.

For all these reasons, "genuine" discipleship is not necessarily the best or the most desirable way to go. It is, in fact, a deeply subjective process of becoming. Though these disciples are able to "live" (and I will be using this word often in the next section), according to their own understanding and feelings, they are not fully alive in these "theology camps" simply because they are not connected to the wider culture and community of the academy that houses and disciplines such students. There are some who think that the other than getting engaged, is at least to be doing a religious/faith experience that takes one out of the world. The other's kind of life involves the discipleship. There is no going so far as, for example, becoming a Buddhist priest or a Hindu monk, depending on the Buddhist/Hindu deity, community, community, and culture of the person involved.
