New Directions of Oceanographic Research and Development Noriyuki Nasu, Susumu Honjo, 2012-12-06 The earth where we live is the only planet of our solar system that holds a mass of water we know as the ocean covering 70.8% of the earth's surface with a mean depth of 3,800 m. When using the term ocean we mean not only the water and what it contains but also the bottom that supports the water mass above and the atmosphere on the sea surface. Modern oceanography thus deals with the water, the bottom of the ocean and the air thereon. In addition, varied interactions take place between the ocean and the land so that such interface areas are also extended domains of oceanography. In ancient times our ancestors took an interest in nearshore seas making them an object of constant study. Deep seas on the other hand largely remained an area beyond their reach. Modern academic research on deep seas is said to have been started by the first round the world voyage of Her Majesty's R/V Challenger I from 1872 to 1876. It has been only 120 years since the British ship left Portsmouth on this voyage so oceanography can thus be considered still a young science on its way to full maturity.

The goal of the workshop was to bring together scientists, engineers and technologists to explore future directions in oceanography with an emphasis on physical processes. The focus centered on research and technology needs, trends and barriers that may impact the field of oceanography over the next 16 years and highlighted specific areas of interest: submesoscale processes, air-sea interactions, basic and applied research instrumentation and vehicles, ocean infrastructure and education. To guide the white papers and drive discussions, four questions were posed to participants: What research questions could be answered? What will remain unanswered? What new technologies could be
