

4 Metrical structure and parallelism

4.1 Introduction

This chapter deals with word stress patterns in the framework of OT. Within phonology, word stress patterns stand out as being typically governed by conflicting forces, as was recognized in studies in pre-OT metrical phonology. Before we can actually point out the interactions of conflicting metrical constraints, we must first become familiar with some results of the metrical theory of word stress.

Our representational basis is metrical phonology, a theory developed in the 1970s, the central assumption of which is that stress is a rhythmic phenomenon, encoded by strong–weak relations between syllables (Lieberman and Prince 1977, Hayes 1980, 1995, Halle and Vergnaud 1987). Consider the stress pattern of the word Alabama, which contains two pairs of syllables standing in such a strong–weak relationship – [æ.lə.bæ.mə]. We analyse this word rhythmically into two metrical feet of two syllables each – [æ.lə] and [bæ.mə]:

- (1) (. *) PrWd-level
 (* .)(* .) Foot-level
 æ.lə.bæ.mə Syllable-level

The rhythmically strong syllables are initial in the foot: such feet are called trochees. Each foot is represented by a pair of parentheses, and an asterisk on top of the strong syllable, while the weak syllable has a dot. We will refer to the strong syllable of a foot as its head, and to the weak syllable as its non-head. Note that the strong syllable of the final foot is more prominent than that of the initial foot. This weak–strong relationship between feet is represented by yet another metrical constituent, on the next-higher prosodic level – that of the PrWd. Again, relative prominence is marked by a dot and an asterisk, now sitting on top of heads of feet.

Extensive research in the typology of word stress (e.g. Hayes 1995) has shown that stress patterns are a domain of potentially conflicting forces, among which are rhythm (the pressure toward regularly alternating distributions of strong and
