BACK IN 2007, PERE, when Marvel was on the hunt for a director for The Marvels, a young director came in to pitch her ideas for the project to executives and producers. Her mission was the meeting, after Larson sent an all-caps email to their mutual friend, Tony Thompson: All it said was "Nia D'Acosta."

D'Acosta, who was on at the time, got the job, becoming not only Marvel's youngest director ever, but also the first Black woman to helm one of its films. "When I got on those rooms, I'm really excited. This is a big moment," she said at one point. "I was trying to figure out what they want, so I don't have these kinds of scenes." The third Thompson, who knew her way around the Marvel universe, having played T'Pol in the first film, doesn't think D'Acosta is going to get quite enough credit. "She has the confidence of a real filmmaker and also this idea of 'Why couldn't I be able to do these things?' That belief is self—you need that, especially if you're in a position where people are inclined to underestimate you."

When she signed on for The Marvels, D'Acosta had already got one lesson on the million ways that workplaces everywhere are different from home. Now she would direct the sequel to Captain Marvel, which had made more than $1 billion globally, and her movie would have to be a fast and professional comedy that it was allowed to be a little bit of a joke and have

"We were just very impressed with her talent and her work ethic," says the executive producer Kevin Feige.

Working with Marvel had been a long-held dream for D'Acosta, but there would be no. The studio has tapped some regional directors over the years: Ryan Coogler, Yoko Kunita, and others. But, to name a few, all the Marvel Cinematic Universe isn't exactly an action genre. Before the expanded TV division, it was announced that Feige sometimes came over the set every general than a movie production. D'Acosta, however, another movie director, she was on the Marvel's the former for Guardians of the Galaxy writer-director and in a couple of years. "That's where most of the real pain was in my mind when I was," she says. "I was in London, UK, going to shoot for the first time. Big. Movie, who's attempting to shoot approximately for weeks. 'People are like, 'Oh, it's a Marvel film. Cool, cool, cool, but I also have my name on it, so I want to be able to be proud of it.'"
