Tales From the Telling-House Sir Richard Doddridge Blackmore, 2020-09-28 Sometimes of a night when the spirit of a dream flits away for a waltz with the shadow of a pen over dreary moors and dark waters I behold an old man with a keen profile under a parson's shovel hat riding a tall chestnut horse up the western slope of Exmoor followed by his little grandson upon a shaggy and stuggy pony In the hazy folds of lower hills some four or five miles behind them may be seen the ancient Parsonage where the lawn is a russet sponge of moss and a stream tinkles under the dining room floor and the pious rook poised on the pulpit of his nest reads a hoarse sermon to the chimney pots below There is the home not of rooks alone and parson and dogs that are scouring the moor but also of the patches of hurry we can see and the bebies of bleating haste converging by force of men and dogs towards the final rendezvous the autumnal muster of the clans of wool For now the shrill piping of the northwest wind and the browning of furze and heather and a scollop of snow upon Oare oak Hill announce that the roving of soft green height and the browsing of sunny hollow must be changed for the durance of hurdled quads and the monotonous munch of turnips The joy of a scurry from the shadow of a cloud the glory of a rally with a hundred heads in line the pleasure of polishing a coign of rock the bliss of beholding flat nose brown eyes and fringy forehead approaching round a corner for a sheepish talk these and every other jollity of freedom what is now become of them Gone Like a midsummer dream or the vision of a blue sky pastured to match the green hill with white forms floating peacefully a sky where no dog can be much less a man only the fleeces of the gentle flock of heaven Lackadaisy and well a day How many of you will be woolly ghosts like them before you are two months older
