Psychiatry, psychology and homosexual prisoners in New Zealand, 1910–1960

Abstract

Psychiatry, psychology and psychotherapy played an important role in attempts to regulate and rehabilitate New Zealand men imprisoned for sodomy and indecent assault between 1910 and 1960. Little attention has, so far, been paid to the specific psychological ‘treatment’ of such incarcerated men in the international context, but New Zealand’s archives offer up much valuable detail. This article adopts a Foucauldian approach and explores shifting epistemic beliefs alongside the specific practices of key medical officials, and it considers how prisoners’ subjectivities were shaped in the process. Attempts to displace homoerotic desire gradually gave way to the articulation of same-sex sexuality. New possibilities emerged: when the psychologising of homosexuality in prisons opened the door to self-expression it showed an affinity with the organised resistance of the 1970s.

Introduction

Until recent decades, men who had sex with boys, or other men, risked imprisonment in New Zealand and most other Western countries. No age of consent existed for New Zealanders until 1986; until then all male–male sex was illegal and men were jailed for the crimes of sodomy and ‘indecent assault’ even if the sex was mutually desired. Rather a lot has been written about the circumstances that caused men to be imprisoned in New Zealand and elsewhere, but there is much less on what happened to them once they entered the correctional institutions.¹ This article focusses on one aspect of the latter: the shifting roles of psychiatry, psychology and psychotherapy in official attempts to regulate and rehabilitate New Zealand men imprisoned for sodomy and indecent assault between 1910 and 1960.

In one respect, New Zealand was relatively unusual internationally. In 1917, a single prison, New Plymouth, was set aside for this group of men, and most of those convicted of homosexual crimes were sent there until 1952. At the same time, those responsible for prisoners’ psychological wellbeing at New Plymouth, and in other New Zealand prisons after 1952, drew upon a range of ideas circulating internationally. There was a variety of concerns, none of which proved particular to any one society: the aetiology of male homosexuality, the lines between normative and criminal behaviour, what characterised an acceptable mentality, and how prisoners’ desires and actions might be morally regulated. The New Zealand example provides many useful insights into the development of psychology,
