

Radio Wave Propagation in the Ionosphere

To understand riometers, one must understand the physics they purport to study!

Basic Description

A radio wave that passes through an ionized medium causes the electrons of that medium to vibrate about a mean position. If the vibrating electrons collide with the heavier, relatively stationary ions, radio wave energy is absorbed from the wave and transferred to the medium. The rate of absorption depends on the collision frequency (i.e., the number of collisions per oscillation) – that is, on ν/ω , where ν is the electron collision frequency and ω is the angular wave frequency of the radio wave.

Higher ionization rate in atmosphere \rightarrow higher electron density \rightarrow more electrons to steal energy from radio waves \rightarrow less radio wave energy at riometer site
