

Planning for Learning - the whole child experience

Collect information

Why do educators need to collect information?

The type of gathering information provides a fuller view holistic picture of the child and the distance traveled in relation to the child's learning and development from one moment to another

What information are educators collecting?

The information gathered includes but is not limited to, the child's content, the interests, strengths and abilities as well as community and cultural aspects of each child

How might educators collect information?

By carefully observing children, documenting what they notice about the child, talking with the child and their family and using a range of different methods including journals or notes, anecdotal narratives, learning stories, taking photographs, recording video/audio and collecting samples of children's work

Reflect/review

Why reflect and review on the planning process?

The purpose of reflective practice is to enhance children's learning and relationships within ECE by using new information and insights and applying these to practice. Professional educators continually look closely at what is going on in their curriculum.

What is the educator reflecting on and reviewing?

What went well? What was not so successful? Were more time, resources or space needed? Was the child involved? Why or why not? What was the child doing during the experience, routine or interaction? Where to from here? Future ideas? Where and what will be documented? How was the learning for children influenced? How do children benefit from that experience?

How can the educator reflect and review?

Ask questions, seek feedback from children, families and colleagues, collect information about the child's experience and review this, make a part of the day to reflect on, document children's behaviour using a variety of methods

Question and Analyse

Why do educators need to spend time questioning, interpreting and analysing the information?

To consider how the gathered information, the reflection on a planned experience and the educator's own practice influence the second outcomes and short and long term goals for each child individually and collectively as a group

What are educators questioning or analysing?

Gathered information about the child's content, what they noticed about the child/routine when involved in experience and routine, how the environment or educator's own practice participation influenced or impacted the child's experience

How will the educator go about this?

Talking with other colleagues, practice mentors, families and children about what they noticed, documenting this and asking questions that enable educators to consider sound questions. Why is it important to know the information? Will the information be used to extend the child's interest or ideas or to inform the focus of the day's events or later? Will I plan a group experience, individual experience, routine or interaction from this information? Do I need to discuss my thoughts with the family, child and/or colleagues about the information?

Act/Do

Why spend time thinking about the educator's role?

When educators spend time thinking about their role in children's learning and development, they recognise the significant impact and influence that presence as an active participant or intentional bystander has on outcomes for children

What will the educator do?

Engage with children in a meaningful and purposeful way, recognise when to be a bystander and when to fully participate with children and their learning

How will this be documented?

Show the moment is considered in the planned experience. Be in the moment with children, know when to step back and when to participate. Allow for all types of learning styles and be mindful of time frames if possible. Also model, facilitate, demonstrate, actively listen and question

Plan

Why do educators have a planned/intentional approach for children's learning?

To ensure goals are set for children and the educator is able to demonstrate how children's holistic learning and development are promoted, current and emerging learning and development are enhanced and new thinking is provided using the ECE's learning outcomes as a reference point

What do educators plan for?

To facilitate learning opportunities including using routines and authentic experiences within the home based environment to consolidate and enhance current and emerging learning and development, provide new thinking and promote each child's inquiry mind

How is planning recorded?

Using a range of methods - templates such as mapping tools, planning documents, online apps, a shared feedback page or planning book/library
