

Research on High-Quality Development of Corporate Pensions from a Multi-Pillar Pension Perspective

Weiye Wang*

Harbin University of Commerce, Suihua City, Heilongjiang, China

Abstract: The corporate pension system is an integral component of the multi-pillar retirement framework. It is a retirement security system jointly participated in by employers and employees and represents a collective form of employee personal accounts and corporate funds. As China's aging process accelerates and pension security issues become more pronounced, the corporate pension system has gradually become one of the commonly adopted retirement security systems both domestically and internationally. However, the corporate pension system in China still faces many issues and challenges. These include low employee participation rates, non-uniform regulatory standards, suboptimal investment returns, personal account security risks, and the balancing of interests among different stakeholders.

1. Origin of Research

Corporate annuity is a form of retirement security provided by enterprises for their employees and constitutes a significant element of the personal retirement security system in China. Mainly, the corporate annuity involves contributions from companies, who pay a specified sum into the pension fund at a determined rate, which employees receive upon retirement to make up for the shortcomings of the national basic pension insurance scheme. The primary characteristics of the corporate annuity encompass: (1) being autonomously set up by the companies and managed and operated in accordance with the economic situation and practical circumstances of the enterprise, thus allowing companies to offer more appropriate pension schemes suited to their specific conditions; (2) administration and operation by specialized organizations, including trust companies, investment funds, and the like, to guarantee the security and prudent investment and management of the retirement funds; (3) specific tax benefits, for instance, the ability to list corporate pension contributions as deductible business costs, thus lowering the corporate income tax obligations; (4) optional engagement, with employees able to autonomously opt for the pension security plan that best fits their situation based on their individual needs and capacity to bear risk; (5) varied pension disbursement options, including lump-sum payouts, supplementary individual accounts, or phased annuity payments, etc. In summary, the corporate annuity is a vital pension security measure that complements both the national basic pension insurance and individual pension schemes, providing more adaptable and individualized pension security options for companies and their staff. Moreover, the advancement of corporate annuities aids in enhancing and expanding China's pension security system.

2. Challenges of Corporate Annuities within the Multi-Pillar Retirement Framework

2.1. Relatively Low Participation Rates

The phenomenon of relatively low participation rates in corporate pensions is a complex issue with various contributing factors. One significant aspect is the voluntary nature of the corporate pension system, which necessitates a shared financial commitment from both employers and employees. This dual-contribution structure means that for the pension plan to accumulate substantial funds, both parties must be willing to contribute. However, a significant number of companies demonstrate a reluctance to allocate financial resources towards their employees' pension funds. This reluctance can stem from a variety of reasons, such as financial constraints, prioritization of other business investments, or a lack of understanding of the long-term benefits that corporate pensions can provide for employee retention and satisfaction. Concurrently, there is a segment of the workforce that maintains a cautious stance on participating in corporate pension plans. This hesitancy is often rooted in a perception that the personal financial investment required is not justified by the potential future benefits. Employees may doubt the security or profitability of the pension scheme, or they may prioritize immediate financial needs over long-term retirement planning. Additionally, the other side of the issue lies in the relatively nascent state of promotion, education, and training concerning China's corporate pension system.
