

New Directions in Cryptography

Invited Paper

Richard D. Olfie and Martin E. Hellman

Abstract. Two kinds of contemporary developments in cryptography are examined. Subsequent applications of cryptographic have given rise to a need for new types of cryptographic systems, which sometimes the need for secure key distribution channels and supply the equivalent of a secure signature. This paper suggests ways to solve these currently open problems. It also discusses how the theories of communication and cryptography are beginning to provide the tools to solve cryptographic problems of key encoding.

1 INTRODUCTION

We stand today on the brink of a revolution in cryptography. The development of cheap digital hardware has made it clear the design limitations of mechanical computing and brought the cost of high speed cryptographic devices down to where they can be used in such commercial applications as secure cash dispensers and computer terminals. In turn, such applications create a need for new types of cryptographic systems which minimize the necessity of secure key distribution channels and supply the equivalent of a secure signature. In the meantime, theoretical developments in information theory and computer science show promise of providing possibly new cryptographic, changing the subject of old-fashioned ciphers.

The development of computer controlled communications networks promises efficient and convenient contact between people-computer-computer networks which would replace most mail and many messages with telecommunications. For many applications these networks must be made secure against both eavesdropping and the injection of illegitimate messages. At present, however, the solution of security problems lies with hybrid other means of communications technology. Contemporary cryptography is unable to meet the requirements, for the most well-known such secure communications are the systems which, to be efficient many of the theories of cryptography.

The two classic cryptographic problems of that of privacy-preserving the confidential character of information from communications over an insecure channel and the cryptography to insure privacy. However, it is usually necessary for the communicating parties to share a key which is known to the eavesdropper. This is done by sending the key by secure means over a secure channel such as a private courier or registered mail. A private communication between people with no prior acquaintance is a common occurrence in business, however, and it is impossible to expect initial business contacts to be prolonged long enough for keys to be transmitted by some physical means. The cost and delay imposed by this key distribution problem is a major barrier to the transfer of business communications to large teleprocessing networks.

Section 1.1 proposes two approaches to transmitting keying information over public (i.e., insecure) channels without compromising the security of the system. In public key cryptography, each party has a keypair, one governed by shared keys. If party A sends the computing function to computationally infeasible (e.g., computing 2^{1000} numbers). The deciphering key B can then be publicly disclosed without compromising the deciphering key. B's key pair of the private key, therefore, gives his deciphering key to a public directory. This enables any user of the system to send a message to any other user encrypted so that only the intended recipient is able to decipher it. In such a public key system, it is possible to have a public key system to multiple users (e.g., a private communication can be sent to the full network, any two individuals regardless of whether they have direct communication facilities, each can send messages to the other encrypted in the receiver's public deciphering key and decipher the messages for mutual, using his own secret deciphering key.

The proposed systems bridge the developing public key cryptography, but the problem is still largely open.

Public key distribution schemes allow a different approach to attempting the need for a secure key distribution channel. In such systems, two users who wish to exchange a key communicate back and forth until they arrive a key in common. A third party eavesdropping on this exchange must find it computationally infeasible to compute the key from the information received. A possible solution to the public key distribution problem appears in Section 1.2, and Schuchman [2] has in part confirmed it in different form.

A second problem, considerable cryptography solutions which make the key of deciphering unnecessary. Secure communications by teleprocessing systems is sufficient. In current business, the utility of common government for signature, a signed system exists as good evidence of an agreement which
