Notations for a
Participatory Environment

Philip Thiel

Philip Thiel believes that environmental design and research should be based on the shared experience of the users in the context of their environment through the environment. The idea is that design should be primarily concerned with the self-identified and clearly specified needs and preferences of the users. The process is a progressive inquiry to the facts, past or present, in the development of new ideas and procedures necessary for the implementation of this approach in environmental design and planning research.

This involves a self-oriented participatory process of environmental planning, design, and management termed "active design." It identifies and profiles the properties, uses, and flow of the environment and then creates a representation of these uses as necessary to the formation of "responsive public design opportunities" as part of the design process. Design development then proceeds with reference to the experience of these uses in order to determine design in the form of integrated environmental responses.
