Plant Closure Policy Dilemma Labor Law And Bargaining:

The Plant Closure Policy Dilemma Wayne R. Wendling, 1984 In 1982 plant closings in the United States affected approximately 1 percent of the country's manufacturing facilities and 1 percent of its manufacturing labor force Included among the reasons cited for plant closings were low productivity high wages and inflexible work rules Given the nature of the reasons for plant closings and the magnitude of the problem collective bargaining may be the most appropriate institution to solve the problem Collective bargaining can address the specific issues in a plant and may lead to a solution to meet the needs of both management and labor An examination of the case law that has evolved in the formulation of judicial interpretations of the duty to bargain and the actual contract provisions negotiated in major collective bargaining agreements helps to place into perspective the role that collective bargaining can play in averting plant closings Assuming that plant closure is a mandatory topic of bargaining it is recommended that bargaining occur in and only in those instances in which there is a real probability that bargaining could lead to a solution In no instance however should more than 90 days be permitted to elapse between the notice of closure and the resolution of the problem be it a new agreement permitting continued operations or closure of the plant Appended to this report is a discussion of the special impact of plant closings on older adults MN

The Plant Closure Policy Dilemma Wayne R. Wendling, 1984 Study of labour legislation relating to the use of collective bargaining in resolving labour relations problems arising from plant shutdown in the USA discusses severance pay compensation of wage differentials and wages loss in small and large local level labour markets considers judicial decisions and the criteria indicating a duty to bargain analyzes the frequency of collective agreements dealing with plant closure notes the problem of older workers References Fair Reduction in Force Practices Act of 1984 United States.
