Abstract:- The study aimed to investigate culture of accountability in law enforcement, which is of particular importance. Police departments need to create a system of internal checks and balances to make sure officers carry out their duties properly and act with integrity. Police accountability ensures that officers can work together effectively. They can trust their commanders to make ethical decisions. They know their fellow officers will put the needs of the department and the public ahead of personal interests. A culture of accountability in law enforcement also builds trust between the police and the community. The public holds the police to high standards. When police violate the rules, they break public trust and lose credibility. This ultimately makes policing more difficult, as people are unlikely to cooperate with police if they don't trust them. The second aim of the study was to investigate oversight and integrity in the police. The third aim is to identify how the levels of police professionalism within the South African Police Service could be improved. A literature review on adult learning, training and development, as well as SAPS professionalism, was conducted.

I. INTRODUCTION

Professionalism is the aim, conduct or qualities that characterize a vocation that requires advanced training in some liberal art or science. It is characterized by service to others, assessment of the client's needs, practice as well as ethical conduct. Many confuse the term especially when it comes to law enforcement with a soft image, cool, aloof officer with no feeling, crisp uniform, and using high tech as an expert at fighting crime. Responsibility on the other hand is defined as assuming accountability for an action, task or a decision. Professionalism in the police force has several positive impacts that include good service to the public, better pay for the constables, ethical conduct, strong community support as well as respect and a stronger role in a Criminal Justice System. In ethics, the aspect that matters is doing things in the rightful way irrespective of the individual in question. Police officers as law enforcers must safeguard the public's trust to perform their jobs effectively. Because ethical conduct greatly impacts public trust, law enforcement agencies must closely examine their policies, reward systems, and training to ensure that their agency fosters a culture of firm ethical values. Entrenched police attitudes can impede professionalism by encouraging promotions based on attrition and political affiliation, resisting change, and failing to appreciate the value of training.

II. POLICE ACCOUNTABILITY

Accountability is understood to mean the relationship "between the bearer of a right or a legitimate claim and the agents or agencies responsible for fulfilling or respecting that right". This means that a government must be able to execute its mandate, and indeed explain how it did so. The point has also been made that the normal features of a democracy (eg multi-party elections and universal suffrage) are necessary, but not sufficient to ensure healthy accountability between citizens and the government. Democratic elections therefore do not make for clean government and new democracies remain haunted by human rights violations, nepotism and corruption, which do not disappear with the advent of democratic elections.

Effective police accountability involves identifying and punishing those who have committed misconduct, and ensuring accountability after the act. Because police officers act on the basis of directives, accountability includes responsibility for the direction, control or diligence exercised before and during operations to ensure observance of the law and policies and of human rights. This is known as accountability before the act, which also includes the notion that the police are acting in accordance with the stated requirements of the general public or their representatives. In other words, effective accountability involves: "Guidance for the police on what to do and how to do it (before the act)" Supervision of the police and awareness of the need for accountability (during the act) "Remedying improper police actions and omissions (after the act)" Feedback and opportunities to reflect on lessons learned (after the act).

Given that accountability includes responsibility for giving directions and preparing police officers for their work, it follows that accountability is not limited to the actions of individual officers but applies to supervisors as well as the agency as a whole. Misconduct is seldom restricted to one individual. Supervisors need to be aware of the conduct of those under their command and are responsible for it, as are
