

Between Political Economy and Cultural Studies: Towards a Refinement of American Critical Communication Research

Critical communication research in the United States may well be on the brink of a radical rethinking and rearticulation of its central problematic. Conducted primarily within the bounds of political economy, U.S. researchers have assembled an impressive array of political economic analyses of media industries and telecommunications policies (e.g., Danielian, 1939; Gandy, 1983; Guback, 1969; Mosco, 1982; Schiller, 1973; Smythe, 1957; Wasko, 1982, etc.). Augmenting this research has been a series of critical reflections on the state of communication research in the U.S. (e.g., Smythe, 1954; Gitlin, 1978) that has probed into the mainstream's theoretical and methodological assumptions revealing a deep-seated, often unspoken commitment to functionalism and psychologistic individualism. These theoretical commitments have been tied by critical researchers back into the mainstream's methodological commitment to variable analysis, which itself rests on an assumption that human and social experience can be separated into discrete particles for measurement and manipulation. For the past thirty years, then, this dialectic of research and critique has driven U.S. critical scholars. Similarly, in Britain, critical scholars, principally at the Leicester Centre, have combined political economy with a particularly sharp critique of the U.S. mainstream (e.g., Murdock and Golding, 1974, 1978; Halloran, 1981; Curran, Gurevitch, Woollacott, 1982, and Elliott, 1974). This meshed with the American work to form an especially strong and unified approach. Thus, for U.S. researchers, the focus for critical work was tightly centered on industrial structure with a tendency towards a reflection theory of ideology and reception. For Americans, until recently cross-fertilization with British critical research was limited primarily to the Leicester political economists.

However, unlike the U.S. where cultural studies has been largely in the hands of neo-Boasian idealists (Berger, 1973; Carey, 1978; Carey and Kreiling, 1974; Cawelti, 1971; Kreiling, 1978; Newcomb, 1974), in the U.K. an independent cultural studies rooted in materialist notions of collectivity and lived experience also flourished (e.g., Hall, 1980 a & b; Hall et al., 1978; Hebdige, 1979;
