propitiation of the gods after the catastrophic earthquake they had lived through.

12 The MACELLUM is the last of the series of really big buildings which stood around the Forum. It was a complex built in the Imperial age as a covered market, and had large shops both on the outside, on Via degli Augustali and the Forum, and on the inside, under the colonnade around the large internal square, measuring 37 by 27 metres (121 by 88 ft). In the centre of this square, which still has traces of its rich pictorial decoration on the west wall, was a rotunda with 12 columns covered by a cupola (« tholos ») and containing a fish-pond in the middle. There were three large areas at the end of the square. The central one was dedicated to the Imperial family, and here the statues of Octavia (sister of Augustus) and Marcellus (son of Octavia), now in the National Museum of Naples, were found. Probably the area on the left was a refreshment room and the one on the right was used as a fish market. The facade of the Macellum looking onto the Forum is an interesting one: it contains shops which may have been occupied by the money-changers of the time (« argentarii »). In the centre is the typical double entranceway with an aedicule in the middle, standing on columns, which contained a statue of some member of the Imperial family.
