Broker, Mediator, Patron, and Kinsman Conner Bailey, 1976 This study attempts to relate questions of rural leadership to the constantly changing social and economic environment of a rural district in Malaysia during the twentieth century The study itself began as an effort to analyze a single instance of structural change in Malay village leadership which occurred while the author worked in Sik District as a Peace Corps Volunteer 1968 1971 A research proposal was developed positing a traditional pattern of behavior which could be identified as traditional leadership the better to contrast this with the bureaucratic style of the district's new penghulus headmen of a mukim or subdistrict As research progressed it became obvious that there was in fact no single traditional leadership pattern to be discovered but rather that over time adaptations were regularly made whenever a significant change in Sik s social and economic environment occurred Although the study has retained rural leadership as a primary concern it has been found necessary to relate it to Sik s social and economic history
