

Reformulating Special Education:
Policy & Implementation from School Level to District Level

W. Russell A. Skusek

Abstract

This paper discusses the challenges of reformulating special education policy and implementation from the school level to the district level. It begins by outlining the current state of special education in the United States, highlighting the significant disparities in funding and outcomes across different states and districts. The author then explores the complexities of translating policy into practice, emphasizing the need for a systemic approach that addresses both the structural and cultural factors influencing educational outcomes. Key challenges identified include limited resources, fragmented governance, and the difficulty of achieving meaningful change in deeply entrenched practices. The paper concludes by offering recommendations for improving the effectiveness of special education reform efforts, such as strengthening leadership, fostering collaboration, and ensuring that policies are grounded in evidence and equity.
