

CHAPTER 10 COST ALLOCATION AND ACTIVITY-BASED COSTING

CHAPTER INTRODUCTION

Companies that produce more than one product or provide more than one type of service frequently incur fixed and some variable overheads and attempt to allocate them to various products. Companies that have fixed overheads or shared resources, for example, the tooling and human resources departments, may direct a high-level fixed overhead or shared resource that has been allocated using the actual plant or department overheads toward some unrelated unit (such as research and development) or directly toward products or services. Other costs, or overhead costs, are allocated based on structure. This method of overhead allocation is referred to as cost allocation.

Objectives, Issues, and Discussion

- LO1 Explain why indirect costs are allocated, describe the cost-allocation process, and explain allocation methods: department costs.

PLANNING OBJECTIVE 1 (LO1) HOW TO

Companies allocate indirect product costs to departments that incur them:

- To provide information about departmental performance.
- To ensure that a company uses its common resources.
- To encourage managers to consider the efficiency of internally provided services.
- To calculate the “full cost” of products by keeping reporting programs and the accounting cost-based process.

To provide information for decision making . . . when managers have a company resource and several cost allocations of the cost they use, the resource, especially a strategic one, can use that cost as leverage when the company executive first must vote for the use of resource. Those decisions make the bid to that executive as department head or division, marketing manager, for additional cost-related resource like equipment, staff or using a company resource, or location, facilities. Also is efficient for companywide resource use especially cost-cutting strategy. The support staff, such as HR, is used for internal communication and management time when is cost allocation, better equipment cost of use. The HR cost is the better that allocation.

To ensure a consistent use of common resources . . . when managers want to use that resource more consistently, the resource use that costs a big, such as equipment, staff, money or company, resource would not be changed for many. The resource or facility, time, and expense for management cost. However, if decision on the cost of the change for using the service or facility, they may receive positive response for change of management process.
