The Principles of Education William Carl Ruediger, 2015-06-25 Excerpt from The Principles of Education The aim of this book is to present an outline of the Principles of Education for use in college and normal school classes in reading circles and in the teacher's private professional reading. After an introductory chapter which aims to orientate the student in the field of education, the book attempts to bring together and organize the leading tendencies in modern educational thought pertaining to the bases, aims, values, and essential content of education, to discuss the principles underlying the administration of the curriculum, to inquire into the agencies that educate, and to review the fundamental psychological principles that underlie the teaching process. The standpoint of no particular philosophical system is adopted, but the material is presented from the point of view of inductive science. Because footnotes are distracting to many readers, a definite attempt has been made to reduce their number to the minimum. All explanatory material has been woven into the text, while the sources of quotations and most of the references to educational literature have been indicated within the text by means of key numbers placed in parentheses that refer to the Bibliography on pages 297-300. The first of these numbers is the number assigned to the reference, while the second gives the page within the reference. Thus 50-85 would refer to McMurry's How to Study, page 85. Moral Principles in Education by John Dewey. It is one of the complaints of the schoolmaster that the public does not defer to his professional opinion as completely as it does to that of practitioners in other professions. At first sight it might seem as though this indicated a defect either in the public or in the profession, and yet a wider view of the situation would suggest that such a conclusion is not a necessary one. The relations of education to the public are different from those of any other professional work. Education is a public business with us in a sense that the protection and restoration of personal health or legal rights are not. To an extent characteristic of no other institution save that of the state itself, the school has power to modify the social order. And under our political system it is the right of each individual to have a voice in the making of social policies, as indeed he has a vote in the determination of political affairs. If this be true, education is primarily a public business and only secondarily a specialized vocation. The layman then will always have his right to some utterance on the operation of the public schools.
