The subject of geomagnetic micropulsations has developed extremely rapidly and it is difficult to know when is an appropriate time to pause and assess the sum total of our knowledge both observational and theoretical There has in recent years been a tremendous increase in both the quantity and quality of data and also many theoretical advances in our understanding of the phenomenon Undoubtedly there will be further progress in both areas but it seems worthwhile now to review both our knowledge and our ignorance This book was essentially completed by the end of April 1969 and tries to give a summary of the subject up to that time The Earth is enclosed in the magnetosphere a hollow carved out of the solar wind by the Earth's magnetic field Above the ionosphere there is a very tenuous thermal plasma of partially ionized hydrogen in diffusive equilibrium with magnetic and gravitational forces and energetic protons and electrons that constitute the trapped Van Allen radiation belts Throughout this anisotropic and inhomogeneous plasma natural and man made electromagnetic energy propagates in a wide variety of modes and frequency bands This book is concerned with that class of natural signals called geomagnetic micropulsations short period usually of the order of seconds or minutes fluctuations of the Earth's magnetic field
