It is an easily overlooked presupposition of such naming that the diarist must remember the alleged rule of retention rights, but in the circumstances of the private diary 'remembering the rule actually' carries no meaning.²

RESEMBLANCE NOMINALISM AND RUSSELL'S REGRESS

Giovanna Battigaglia-Pereira

In a famous passage Bertrand Russell argued that any attempt, like that of Resemblance Nominalism, to get rid of universals in favour of resemblance facts (20, p. 48). More precisely, Russell thought that no resemblance theory could avoid postulating a universal of resemblance without falling into a vicious infinite regress. And he added that admitting a universal of resemblance made it pointless to avoid other universals. In this paper I shall defend Resemblance Nominalism, a theory which gets rid of universals in terms of resemblances, from both of Russell's points by arguing (a) Resemblance Nominalism can avoid the postulation of a universal of resemblance without falling into a vicious infinite regress (i) and (ii) even if Resemblance Nominalism had to admit a universal of resemblance, this would not make it pointless to avoid the postulation of other universals (i). But before doing so I shall briefly introduce Resemblance Nominalism (3) and Russell's regress (10), and then I shall consider some failed arguments and strategies against the regress (13–17).

1. Resemblance Nominalism

Resemblance Nominalism is a solution to the Problem of Universals. I have argued elsewhere that the Problem of Universals, strictly understood, is what I call the Many over One, rather than the traditional One over Many (17, pp. 268–70). The Many over One is the problem of explaining how a single particular can have a multiplicity of properties (17, pp. 268–70). This solution to the Problem of Universals amounts to the claim that it is for any thing or particular x to have properties F, G, H etc. How do solutions to the Problem of Universals explain how a single particular can have a multiplicity of properties? By giving the truthmakers of sentences attributing properties to things—that is, by giving the truthmakers of sentences like 'x has properties F, G, H ...'. Now, such sentences are short for conjunctions like 'x has property F and x has property G and x has property H and ...' and the truthmakers of these are the truthmakers of their conjuncts. Thus, in my view, what a solution to the Problem of Universals has to do is to give the truthmakers of sentences which, like 'x has the property F', attribute a property to a particular (17, pp. 270–7). Properties here must not be understood as whatever is expressed by a predicate: the properties with which solutions to the Problem of Universals are concerned are what David Lewis (15, p. 60; 13, pp. 181–9) calls genuine or natural, as opposed to abstract ones. Genuine properties are those which, among other things, have to do with the causal powers of particulars and such that science, or perhaps just physics, tries to make an inventory of. So when in the following I speak of properties I must be understood as speaking of genuine or natural properties.

On this view of the problem Russell's claim about Universals, or Universalism, as I shall call it here, the doctrine prominently held by David Armstrong, has it that what makes it that
