RESTRUCTURING AMERICA'S SCHOOL SYSTEMS

Robert E. Peterson (below) defines the kind of professional education that America's school systems desperately need. After earning an Ed. D. from the University of Massachusetts, he began his career as an educator in 1957. He joined the Boston school system in 1974 and was appointed Superintendent in Cambridge in 1986. His tenure there was characterized by bold and successful innovation. In 1988 he accepted an offer to become Superintendent of Milwaukee. He recently addressed a CDE Roundtable on Innovation in Education to discuss the Cambridge Plan. An excerpt from that presentation follows.

Cambridge is a city of 100,000 people with 8,000 kids in the school system, 50% minority, 50% white. In the early and early seventies Cambridge began to segregate. Black kids began to be assigned to one section of town, white kids to another. You could tell by the state of the building which kids went where.

Somewhere around the mid seventies, the superintendent and the school board became aware of their responsibilities and tried to desegregate. They went about it with no experience. First they rationed, trying to sprinkle black kids into white areas of town. That didn't work. Next they tried open enrollment.

If I would ever argue against any version of choice, it would be open enrollment, where people just walk up to schools and ask principals if there is room. Because under open enrollment, if you look like me and wear a tie, you might get in. But if you don't have a tie and your hands are dirty, you won't get in. Open enrollment caused a lot of mischief in Cambridge.

Then in 1977 the school board decided to go to magnet schools at the elementary level. These schools did their job. They desegregated—unlike the other non-magnet schools did not. And predictably, Cambridge began to lose student population, while student population in particular, and some of the schools they tried to integrate, but didn't magnetize, began to get a lot darker in complexion.

Finally Cambridge settled on a controlled choice mechanism. They made all elementary schools magnet schools.

When I went to Cambridge, I found a system that was providing access but not equivalence. The magnet schools were very exciting, yet many schools remained the same old schools they always had been. People living in the neighborhood continued to choose those schools because they were close by. Even under choice interior schools had a mission, but they didn't have equivalence.

After my first six months I sat at a new controlled choice plan before the board. I said, "Over the next three years we have four elementary schools (out of 12) which we have to move from substandard performance to the district average. We have to commit to doing that on the record. We have to be aggressive about providing resources both out of our own budget and out of whatever extra magnet monies come in." Over the next three and a half years, that's exactly what we did.

In the beginning I was criticized a great deal by the magnet community. Magnet schools are used to getting everything, literally everything. Magnet monies come from the state and went to magnet schools. If you went for a new Apple computer network, the magnet schools received it. Everybody else wanted only an equivalent. They had that.
