

FIBRE OPTICS

Introduction:

An optical fiber is a flexible, transparent fiber made of high quality glass (silica) or plastic, slightly thicker than a human hair. It can function as a waveguide, or "light pipe", to transmit light between the two ends of the fiber. The branch of physics which deals with the transmission and reception of light waves using optical fibers, which acts as guiding media, is known as fiber optics.

STRUCTURE OF AN OPTICAL FIBRE:

The basic structure of an optical fiber consists of three parts; the core, the cladding, and the buffer or protecting skin. Light propagates mainly along the core of the fiber. The core is generally made of glass. The refractive index of core is represented by n_1 its typical value is 1.62. The core is surrounded by a layer called the cladding with less refractive index than core. The cladding is generally made of glass/plastic. The refractive index of cladding is represented by n_2 its typical value is 1.52. For extra protection, the cladding is enclosed in an additional layer called buffer. The buffer is a layer of material used to protect an optical fiber from physical damage.

PRINCIPLE OF AN OPTICAL FIBRE

The light launched inside the core through its one end propagates to the other end due to total internal reflection at the core-cladding interface. This is the principle of optical fiber. Total internal reflection at the fiber wall can occur only if the following two conditions are met.

1. The refractive index of the core material n_1 must be higher than that of the cladding n_2 .
2. At the core-cladding interface the angle of incidence i must be greater than critical angle.
