

much money on its investment, and there have been no more spinoffs from ITRI since 1994. For its part industry does not want more spinoffs, which now would create more competition in the market place. As a result the government's role in R&D has gradually evolved into a more traditional activity and is expected to continue to decrease in the future.

DISCUSSION

A Consortium in Taiwan?

Glen Fong of Thunderbird, the American Graduate School of Management, asked whether Taiwan's spectacular startup story would evolve to include more collaborative R&D, like in the United States, Europe, and Japan. He asked about the "so-called Taiwan SEMATECH" called ASTRO. Dr. Hu said there has indeed been an attempt to establish collaborative research in Taiwan, because the benefits of collaborative activity are well understood. As in other countries government funding levels are inadequate to support an effective R&D effort, simply because the cost of manufacturing equipment has increased so fast. Taiwan has studied the models of SEMATECH, Selete, ASET, IMEC, and other consortia, and it plans to combine industry money with government money to do R&D for the common good. For 2 years ERSO has been chartered to create that kind of consortium, which was moderately successful until the beginning of 2000. With a new political party in power, industry policy has become less clear, and all further action is on hold until plans are firm and new funds are committed for the consortium.

Another questioner asked whether the Taiwan semiconductor companies are doing their own research. Dr. Hu said they are, and more noticeably at the international level. TSMC is a member of International SEMATECH, and UMC has formed an alliance with IBM and Infineon. The plans of smaller companies are not as well known.

THE SCIENCE PARK APPROACH IN TAIWAN

Chien-Yuan Lin
National Taiwan University

Providing Good Soil

Dr. Lin of the Institute of Building and Planning at National Taiwan University said that he would introduce another approach to R&D, the science park. He pointed out that even though Taiwan is small, the government has promoted economic development very heartily, allowing the country to rise from "almost nothing after the Second World War" to a point of considerable accomplishment. He
