Overcoming Substance Abuse

The term “substance abuse” refers to a pattern of drug use that is harmful to the person—physically, mentally, and socially. Alcohol is the legal drug most commonly abused. Others include tobacco, prescription pain medications (such as morphine), sedatives, and stimulants (such as some weight loss drugs). The most frequently abused illegal drugs are cocaine, marijuana, and heroin.

It’s important to distinguish physical dependence from substance abuse. Dependence means that if the drug is stopped, the body has a physical reaction, known as withdrawal. This reaction can include tremors, agitation, nausea or vomiting, anxiety, insomnia, hallucinations, or seizures. Addiction means that the person feels a psychological need for the drug. While most people who abuse drugs have both a physical dependence and a psychological addiction, a person using a legal drug appropriately and under the care of a doctor may develop physical dependence without becoming addicted. That person’s drug use is not considered abuse.

It’s estimated that 10% of adults in the United States have a substance abuse problem. As with many other diseases, early recognition and treatment are key. If you suspect that you, or someone you love, has a substance abuse problem, there are specific signs you can look for and many professionals who can steer you on the road to recovery.

How do I know if I’m at risk?

At present, experts do not agree about what causes substance abuse. But drugs that are most often abused have a pleasurable effect on the brain’s reward system, which reinforces continual use of the drug.

Stressful life situations, including family or legal problems or unemployment; traumatic experiences, such as physical or sexual abuse or witnessing violence; and mental disorders, such as mood or personality disorders, can increase your risk of developing a substance abuse problem. In addition, if you have easy access to drugs, if people around you use drugs, or if you have a family member who’s had a substance abuse problem, you’re at higher risk.

What are the warning signs?

If you feel an uncontrollable need to take a drug even though you know that using it will have a negative effect on you physically and emotionally, you probably have a substance abuse problem. Some specific behavioral signs include: poor judgment or irresponsible behavior (such as using a drug while driving), irritability, personality changes, sudden mood changes, low self-esteem, isolation from family and friends, and loss of interest in social activities.

You also may find that the amount of drug you need to take in order to feel its effect is increasing. Keep in mind, however, that this can happen with some prescription drugs, even when used appropriately.
