J. Walden,2010-05 In 1919 Wilhelm von Graffe a German Naval Officer witnessed the scuttling of the German High Seas Fleet at Scapa Flow This crushing defeat pushed him to dedicate his life to returning Germany to its rightful position of power Years later prior to World War II von Graffe came up with a plan to accomplish that goal Von Graffe s plan centered on the shipping lanes of North America s Great Lakes areas likely to be an integral part of Great Britain s lifeline since both

Canada and the United States would provide abundant supplies to Great Britain's war effort as they had in the past. Von Graffe clearly saw the advantage to Germany in sabotaging such supply shipments. This project became so secret that only Adolf Hitler and his spymaster Admiral Canaris knew the details. However, the possibility for the success of this operation diminished when von Graffe was forced to return to Germany where he found himself faced with an unexpected dilemma which tried his honor as both a citizen and a German Officer. E. J. Walden, a World War II veteran, currently lives and enjoys his retirement in Lake Saint Louis, Missouri. His curiosity as to why the Germans did not do more to impede shipments of war materials from Canada and the United States inspired him to research and write about these shipping hubs. He has written two other works, one occurring during the immediate aftermath of World War II and the second being a series of depression era stories.
