

Management of perinatal cervical spine injury using custom-fabricated external orthoses: design considerations, narrative literature review, and experience from the Hospital for Sick Children. Illustrative cases

Vishwathsen Karthikyan, MD,¹ Sara C. Breitbart, NP-Pediatrics,² Armaan K. Malhotra, MD,¹ Andrea Fung, CO,² Erin Short, NP-PhC,² Ann Schmitt, MD,¹ David E. Lebel, MD, PhD,^{2,3} and George M. Ibrahim, MD, PhD^{1,2}

BACKGROUND Cervical spine injuries in neonates are rare and no guidelines are available to inform management. The most common etiology of neonatal cervical injury is birth-related trauma. Management strategies that are routine in older children and adults are not feasible due to the unique anatomy of neonates.

OBSERVATIONS Here, the authors present 3 cases of neonatal cervical spinal injury due to confirmed or suspected birth trauma, 2 of whom presented immediately after birth, while the other was diagnosed at 7 weeks of age. One child presented with neurological deficits due to spinal cord injury, while another had an underlying predisposition to bony injury, infantile malignant osteopetrosis. The children were treated with a custom-designed and manufactured full-body external orthoses with good clinical and radiographic outcomes. A narrative literature review further supplements this case series and highlights risk factors and the spectrum of birth-related spinal injuries reported to date.

LESSONS The current report highlights the importance of recognizing the rare occurrence of cervical spinal injury in newborns and provides pragmatic recommendations for management of these injuries. Custom orthoses provide an alternate option for neonates who cannot be fitted in halo vests and who would outgrow traditional casts.

KEYWORDS cervical spine injury; orthoses; neonate

Neonatal spine injury is rare, with an estimated incidence of 1 case per 29,000.¹ Furthermore, injury to the spinal cord was identified in 10% of perinatal neonatal deaths or stillbirths at autopsy.² Birth-related spinal cord injury (SCI) is thought to occur secondary to excessive extraction, rotation, or hyperextension of the neck during delivery; as such, shoulder dystocia, breech position, and forceps or vacuum assistance have emerged as risk factors for neonatal SCI. The clinical manifestation of SCI in this population can be significant, with a ranging spectrum of sensorimotor deficits and sometimes apnea, necessitating ventilation.¹ Neonates are at higher risk of upper cervical spine injuries because of underdeveloped muscles and ligaments, relative craniocervical size mismatch, and incomplete mineralization of the vertebrae.³ Based on existing literature, the prognosis of birth-related SCI in neonates is poor, with a high mortality rate and long-term neurological morbidity among surviving patients.^{1,4,5}

SCI in the pediatric population can be classified based on the radiographic appearance: fracture, fracture with subluxation, subluxation alone, and SCI without radiographic abnormality.⁶ Treatment is centered around providing appropriate immobilization, reduction, and stabilization in order to achieve spinal stability while mitigating permanent neurological deficits and long-term sequelae, including joint contractures, fractures, and scoliosis.^{7,8} Current treatment modalities include surgical stabilization and external immobilization systems.⁹ Surgery is particularly challenging in newborns due to their unique anatomy, the potential impact on growth, and difficulty achieving adequate
