What Now for Bilingual Education?

Teachers in Los Angeles wear gags at a July board of educators meeting to protest the passage of the anti-bilingual education initiative, Proposition 227.

BY JAMES CRAWFORD

Last June, when Californians approved Proposition 227 — an initiative that mandates English-only instruction in public schools — it was unclear whether they meant to outlaw bilingual education. The ballot summary was vague, and few voters seemed to read the fine print.

Opinion polls reported contradictory findings about voters' intentions. Most respondents endorsed flexibility for local school districts in educating limited-English-proficient (LEP) children. But on election day, 68% cast their ballots for a single statewide approach. So perhaps it is fitting that, months later, the impact of Proposition 227 remains contradictory as well.

One thing is clear: the new law has been disruptive for schools, confusing for teachers, and traumatic for students. While its implementation varies from district to district, this year English learners are getting far less help in their native tongues. Many have been removed from successful programs and placed in a crash course in English.

Yet some bilingual education survives, thanks to continuing support from parents and educators.

The initiative itself is ambiguous. It requires that LEP students be taught "overwhelmingly in English" through a "sheltered immersion" approach "not normally intended to exceed one year." Once they have acquired "a good working knowledge of English," children must be transferred to mainstream classrooms. After 30 days of English-only instruction — no exceptions — parents may request "waivers" of the rule, but a child under age 10 must have "special needs" to qualify for bilingual instruction.

None of these terms is clearly defined and the State Board of Education has offered minimal guidance. Some districts have exploited the waiver provision to keep bilingual classrooms intact. Others have virtually banned the use of native languages, whether parents request it or not. Many fall somewhere in between, offering "support" — but no reading instruction — in Spanish, Cantonese, Korean, and other languages.

Nearly all parents have sought waivers at some schools; none at others. According to Norm Gold of the California Department of Education, their preferences seem to depend on how well bilingual education worked locally before Proposition 227. "Two-way" bilingual programs, which include English-speaking children learning a second language, are especially in demand. Several have survived by converting to charter school or alternative school status.

A few districts remain under federal court orders and consent agreements to provide bilingual education. San Francisco, whose civil rights' violations led to the

Out Front

An 'out' high school teacher discusses what schools can do to fight the pervasive problem of homophobia.

BY ANNIE JOHNSTON

My prep period was half over. I still had to prepare for a sub the next day and across the materials for my next class when a student appeared at my door. Nervously clutching a bathroom pass as her eyes darted from the room number to me, she asked, "Are you the one who does that support group for..." Her voice trailed off.

"The lesbian, gay, bisexual, and questioning youth support group?" I answered. "Yes. They meet Thursdays at lunch. They are working on a conference of Gay-Straight Alliances around the Bay Area. It's not a large group..." As my explanation continued I could see I had lost her.

"That's not what I want," she said. "I need to talk to someone, right away."

Oh dear, I thought, crisis management. This is not what I can do today. I had to leave early to get my daughter to an appointment.

Instead I said, "What do you need to talk about?"

Slowly and hesitantly it came out. A good friend was attracted to her. She might actually be interested. That scared her to her very core. She sought me out because my room number was announced weekly as the location of the support group meetings. I took her name, I found out what period she could stand to miss, and spent the rest of my prep period finding someone in the health center who would be positive about the possibility that this child might have feelings for someone of the same sex. I was lucky. More often, I end up playing amateur psychologist.

I teach history at Berkeley High School, considered one of the better schools for queer-identified youth (an all-inclusive term, preferred by the students, for queer and questioning youth). Yet even at Berkeley, there are limits to the school's openness to queer youth, who tend to graduate early or to leave for a semester or two of "Independent Studies." The Independent Studies program is an alternative track in
