From Snarling Dogs To Bloody Sunday

Teaching Past the Platitudes of the Civil Rights Movement

Civil rights marchers cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge on their second attempt to march from Selma to Montgomery, AL in March 1965. Marchers were sent back by the police shortly after they crossed the bridge.

By Kate Lyman

"I'm not teaching about civil rights this year," my colleague asserted. "Not teaching about civil rights?" I responded. My teaching buddy and partner had teamed with me in tackling "controversial issues" at the second-third-grade level — AIDS, the "discovery" of America, and homophobia, to name a few. I couldn't believe that she was not going to join me in planning the civil rights unit.

My partner explained that a parent of a child who was continuing in her second-third-grade combination class had objected to the unit on civil rights the previous year. "There was too much violence," she had said. Her daughter had been frightened.

Knowing that I would miss our joint planning sessions and sharing of materials and ideas, I nevertheless decided to go ahead with the unit.

My own experience growing up in an exclusively white and economically privileged suburb of Milwaukee had isolated me from the issues of the Civil Rights Movement. When, as a high school student in the 1960s, I finally became informed in a U.S. history class about the events in the South and the segregation and discrimination in my own city, I was appalled. I started on the long road to try to better understand issues of racism and to do what I could to act on the inequities in our society.

Unlike the suburb I grew up in, my school attendance area is culturally, politically, and socially diverse. Over 80% of the students come from families of color, most of them low-income. There are also low-income and working-class white families, and a smattering of middle-class families from a new development.

I had previously received a generally positive response to the civil rights unit. Parents had shared resources, such as a battered but proud painting of Rosa Parks. One grandmother came in to teach us freedom songs and talk about her efforts in the 1960s to organize an NAACP chapter in Oklahoma.

My former principal and a few teachers had disapproved of teaching such deep and heavy issues to young children. However, I could recall only one negative comment from a parent: "Why are you still teaching Black History when it's past February?" In fact, even though I generally started the unit on or around the observance of Martin Luther King's birthday, related activities integrated into all subject areas extended past January and February and, depending on student interest and the depth of the projects, into the first few weeks of March.

I planned the civil rights unit within the context of a discussion of Human Rights and Children's Rights, in honor of the upcoming 50th anniversary of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, signed on Dec. 11, 1948. It was during that discussion that my students had agreed that among basic rights for children is the right "to not be judged by the color of one's skin." This idea was a logical lead-in to the Civil Rights Movement.

An Untold Story Of Resistance

African-American Educators and IQ Testing in the 1920s and '30s

By Alan Stoskopf

It was not until I was long out of school and indeed after the (first) World War that there came the hurried use of the new technique of psychological (IQ) tests, which were quickly adjusted to suit the black folk absolutely beyond the possibility of refutation.

— W. E. B. Du Bois, 1940

The words of W. E. B. Du Bois still haunt us. We are now experiencing another onslaught and "battered use" of tests in our schools. How African-American educators fought against their uses in the past has important implications for today's resistance to "high-stakes" testing.

We have grown accustomed to the constant refrain of schools needing to institute "world class standards" and be held accountable through externally based, high-stakes exams. Research and experience demonstrate that this version of "education reform" will negatively impact all students, especially students of color from lower income backgrounds. We also know that the best assessments originate in the classroom
