Other authors have suggested a group of "active" neurons in the dorsal midline of the brainstem and ascending to the thalamus as sensory-motor structures, mainly for auditory inputs, which have been suggested as being involved in the control of the thalamus in the context of the sensory-motor system. However, it is not clear whether these structures are involved in the control of the thalamus in the context of the sensory-motor system, or if they are involved in the control of the thalamus in the context of the sensory-motor system.
