Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine the effects of a 12-week resistance training program on the strength and endurance of the lower extremities of sedentary young adults. The subjects were 20 male and 20 female college students, aged 18-25 years, who were randomly assigned to either a resistance training group or a control group. The resistance training group performed a 12-week program of resistance training, consisting of three sessions per week, using a variety of resistance exercises. The control group performed no resistance training. The subjects were tested at baseline and at 12 weeks for strength and endurance. The results of the study showed that the resistance training group had significantly greater strength and endurance than the control group at 12 weeks. The subjects in the resistance training group also had significantly greater muscle mass and bone mineral density than the control group at 12 weeks. The results of this study suggest that resistance training is an effective way to improve strength and endurance in sedentary young adults.
