

As governments strive to discharge their responsibilities and fulfill their tasks, they evolve structurally, building on their own infrastructure to levels of operational maturity. There are four stages of this maturational model as represented in Fig. 5: (1) Basic, (2) Integrated, (3) Interactive and (4) Proactive. At the basic level, the government fulfills its duties and goes about its tasks, each department of government independently providing services. At the integrated stage the different government departments begin to integrate through data sharing processes. As systems evolve further, business processes and their applications integrate to provide interactive services with increased citizen participation in government. The most evolved government would be one offering its services with 24-hour availability government and the citizens, in its natural form, given a way to all the administrative processes that affect daily life. This model such an evolution brings us to the present form: e-Government.

Fig. 5. Government maturity phases

In the e-Government context, integration and citizen participation are functions of the availability of the government for citizens. Greater availability would imply more citizen participation. More participation would mean a more pro-active government, sharing the responsibilities and duties with its citizens and ensuring delivery of quality services to citizens to improve quality of life [15,16]. Let us explore the role of ICT in its government context in the following section.

IV. ICT ROLE IN GOVERNMENT

The role of ICT in government transformation and evolution cannot be overstated. Let us look at an example of government practice in this domain. Fig. 6 depicts a diagram developed by the European Commission that illustrates the role of ICT in enabling various e-government models for the European Union (EU) in 2020 [14]. It illustrates the proposed adoption of technology in six distinct stages. The first stage concentrates on the development of a clear taxonomy of value-based government roles and the identification of key areas of transformation where ICT can make a substantial impact. The second stage involves identifying 'promising' technologies that may contribute to the enhancement of (future) governmental tasks and activities. The third stage represents the identification of what have been labeled the 'hot spots' of government transformation. This stage should result in the identification and clustering of combinations of roles and technologies to various 'hot spots'.

Fig. 6. ICT enablers for Government. Source: [14].

The fourth stage depends upon the way future trends manifest themselves. They might present an scenario in which the consequences of promising ICT developments are actualized as new e-government services and new e-government models. These ICT innovation based service models might show themselves in the broader context of cultural, social, economic, institutional and organizational trends. The fifth stage represents the future-oriented framework in which the benefits and impacts of e-government are measured. The sixth stage represents research work towards, and forming of, apt policy changes that enable successful e-transformation.

The components presented in the above diagram form the crux of this model for ICT in a government context. The model provides an archetype for government transformation and can inform long-term strategic planning. It can be applied to identify emerging trends and opportunities arising in the process of evolution of new information and communication technologies, in order to enhance government performance and capacity for government in 2020 [14].

V. THE TRANSITION TO THE CUSTOMER AGE

In today's climate of political and socioeconomic change, communication is playing a decisive role in promoting development [1]. We are living in the age of information and its digital world of instant communication. The information revolution has dramatically increased the potential for sharing information across the globe [17]. This information age is now evolving.

The emergence of a series of new communications concepts and applications in this age of information revolution has created more opportunities and possibilities for both users and service providers. Forrester's research has identified this new age as the age of the customer [18]. See also Fig. 7. Forrester points out that the Age of Customer is not about 'customer-centricity' thinking or the customer is always right. Rather, it is about the empowerment of customers so that
