

perhaps restrained by centuries of authoritarian rule in mainland China which, after all, produced high levels of insecurity), he never develops an entirely convincing argument. Moreover, some of Redding's sweeping generalizations about Chinese culture — based, as they often are, upon short quotations from a smattering of secondary sources — will make historians uncomfortable. No understanding is shown of the transitional importance of compradore or treaty-port values; nor does the author appear to appreciate either the significant changes which began to take place in late Qing China or the ways in which old-style banks, guilds, and other traditional institutions likewise adapted to the requirements of the international marketplace.

The author's "central purpose" of putting the Overseas Chinese "on the map" (p. 227) will probably appear somewhat pretentious to readers of the Singapore-based Journal of Southeast Asian Studies with its long and distinguished record of publications in this field. But to be fair, it must be remembered that the intended audience of managers and business-school students will not, necessarily, have had much background in East or Southeast Asian history. General readers or those outsiders who must routinely deal with members of the Chinese diaspora might well find The Spirit of Chinese Capitalism informative, particularly the last three chapters more carefully detailing the operational side of family business.

Literary Migrations: Traditional Chinese Fiction in Asia (17th–20th Centuries). Edited by CLAUDINE SALMON. Beijing: International Culture Publishing Corporation, 1987. Pp. 661. Illustrations, Footnotes, Bibliographies.

Classical Chinese literature, distinguished for its antiquity and continuity, is also among the most vital and influential of world literatures, spreading far beyond its geographical borders to neighbouring countries, and across the oceans to the nations of Southeast Asia and further. Whereas Western scholars have long been aware of the impact of classical Greek and Roman traditions on European literary development, there does not seem to have been similar attention paid to the diffusion and influence of Chinese literature. So Claudine Salmon suggests in the introduction to her ambitious and capacious (661-paged) collection of essays, Literary Migrations: Traditional Chinese Fiction in Asia. Her book appears at a time when there seems to be growing interest outside China in the Chinese diaspora, evident, for instance, in recent conferences in the U.S.A. — at the First Conference of the Overseas Chinese on "The Status of the Overseas Chinese Past, Present, & Future", held at the University of Hawaii at Hilo in July 1989, and the Asian American Studies Association Conference on "Comparative and Global Perspectives on the Diaspora" held at Hunter College, New York in June 1989.

Salmon, herself a comparative scholar of Sino-Malay/Indonesian literature who has done pioneering research on Chinese contributions to Southeast Asian culture, and fluent in Chinese, Malay/Indonesian, French and English, is eminently qualified for the task of mapping out the field. Her previous publications include: "La vie littéraire et artistique des Chinois peranakan de Makassar, 1930–1950"; "Chinese Women
