

Training in scientific manuscript writing

Robert H. Glew*, Anil K. Challa and Venkat Gopalan*

Graduate programmes require their doctoral students to write as scholars and experts who publish their findings in quality, peer-reviewed journals. However, since not all programmes require a formal writing course and uniformity in explicit instructions from supervisors is not possible, variability in the preparedness of trainees for scientific manuscript writing is likely. Indeed, results from a self-reported survey of doctoral and postdoctoral researchers that we conducted confirm this uneven preparation, and reinforce the clear need for formal training in disciplinary writing. We review some initiatives, whose implementation should prove profitable in formalizing the instruction of pre- and postdoctoral researchers in the practical skills required to write dissertations and scientific manuscripts, the cornerstone for archiving and transferring disciplinary knowledge.

Keywords: Disciplinary writing, formal training, graduate programmes, postdoctoral research, scientific manuscripts.

‘If your research does not generate papers, it might just as well not have been done.’

— G. M. Whitesides¹

New knowledge that results from research needs to be disseminated to other scientists and the public, and to do so effectively is a learned skill. Despite efforts dating back to the 1960s to impart formal training to doctoral students in scientific writing^{2–4}, historically this learning has been a process of trial and error, mainly during an apprenticeship with his/her mentor^{3,6}. By the end of their training, graduate students are in fact expected to independently write papers and grant proposals (see Box 1 for some examples). Such doctoral requirements have been inspired in part by the realization that clear and persuasive writing is a reflection of logical thinking and the ability to develop scientific arguments – thus writing papers is not merely an archival effort but fundamental to developing the ability to think vigorously about what constitutes scientific proof and how to express scientific findings precisely². Writing is thus an integral part of the initiation into a discipline, as it promotes the identity of a new researcher through specific contributions to the knowledge-making practices of his field⁷.

Some students, especially those for whom English is the native language, are already good writers when they start their graduate work and they further develop their skills during graduate courses in which there is a major writing component. However, given the diverse writing skills of incoming graduate students, writing a scientific paper requires additional formal training, one that includes an elaboration of discipline-specific practices and not merely an enumeration of general effective writing tools. Since such courses in scientific writing are not a universal feature of graduate curricula (see Box 2 for some current offerings), we were curious to know how the challenging goal of writing papers might be fulfilled. To gain insights in this regard, we conducted surveys of graduate students and postdoctoral researchers. Our findings should motivate graduate programme faculty and students to consider the desirability of and strategies for incorporating methodical training in effective scientific writing into the education of young scientists.

Objectives of the surveys

To determine the attitude of graduate students and postdoctoral fellows towards their experiences, perceived skill levels and aspirations with respect to writing scientific manuscripts, we conducted two surveys. We distributed an eight-item survey to graduate students in their third or later year in three life-sciences programmes at the Ohio State University, USA – the demographics of the 73 students who returned completed surveys are shown in Figure 1a. We sent a similar 11-item survey electronically to several postdoctoral researchers, who had their graduate education in universities, both within the US and abroad. We also posted our survey on a professional networking site of the National Postdoctoral Association (www.nationalpostdoc.org) – the demographics of the 185 postdoctoral scholars who returned completed

Rapid urbanization in low and middle income countries LMICs has triggered a childcare crisis As families move to the city they leave behind extended family and traditional support networks parents and guardians particularly mothers are working long hours outside the home often in informal and unstable jobs In response to the increasing demand a range of informal private and NGO providers have sprung up to provide day and sometimes night care Governments are struggling to respond and the care for children in the early years frequently falls between ministries The combination of these factors in LMIC cities has left children from low income families with substandard childcare which poses a threat to their immediate and long term health and development Critical Thinking

E. Ross,2015-02-26

Women Poetry and Politics in Seventeenth Century Britain offers a new account of women's engagement in the poetic and political cultures of seventeenth century England and Scotland based on poetry that was produced and circulated in manuscript. Katherine Philips is often regarded as the first in a cluster of women writers including Margaret Cavendish and Aphra Behn who were political secular literary print published and renowned. Sarah C E Ross explores a new corpus of political poetry by women offering detailed readings of Elizabeth Melville Anne Southwell Jane Cavendish Hester Pulter and Lucy Hutchinson and making the compelling case that female political poetics emerge out of social and religious poetic modes and out of manuscript based authorial practices. Situating each writer in her political and intellectual contexts from early covenanting Scotland to Restoration England this volume explores women's political articulation in the devotional lyric biblical verse paraphrase occasional verse elegy and emblem. For women excluded from the public political sphere these rhetorically modest genres and the figural language of poetry offered vital modes of political expression and women of diverse affiliations use religious and social poetics the tropes of family and household and the genres of occasionality that proliferated in manuscript culture to imagine the state. Attending also to the transmission and reception of women's poetry in networks of varying reach Sarah C E Ross reveals continuities and evolutions in women's relationship to politics and poetry and identifies a female tradition of politicised poetry in manuscript spanning the decades before during and after the Civil Wars.
