Fabricant, 2024 Every practicing physician surgeon advanced practice provider and allied health professional interacts regularly with peer reviewed literature either while creating it or consuming it Despite the countless hours over many years spent in formal clinical training many clinicians and clinician authors lack advanced training or a working nuanced knowledge of research methodology and study design Institutions have responded to this gap by reinforcing their ranks with statistical and methodological support in the form of data analysts epidemiologists and biostatisticians However clinicians are often unable to talk the methodological talk to guide them This ultimately results in a stark disconnect between clinically relevant aspects of research and appropriate study design Existing research methodology texts are largely written by statisticians epidemiologists and other academic public health experts These are not easily digestible by practicing clinicians who need practical knowledge of this content to design their own research or enhance their understanding of the medical literature Furthermore these texts are often too detailed or in the weeds with regard to mathematics and statistical mechanics Practical knowledge is not centrally located rather it is spread out among multiple books articles and other sources This book is a concise accessible and practical guide for clinicians to read and reference when designing and reviewing clinical research It is designed to be a standalone text written by a clinician for clinicians by a practicing clinical research expert who has had advanced formal training in research methodology biostatistics and epidemiology Topics covered include descriptive and comparative statistics power and sample size calculations diagnostic tests bias and study design In each chapter consideration is given to study mechanics advantages and disadvantages of each design and illustrative analytical reviews of existing literature Principles of Research Design and Drug Literature Evaluation Rajender R.
