

This book is a first attempt to explore the complex problems of Romanian etymology in English. Romanian is a Romance language, but it also incorporates all the Balkan languages represented by both Indo-European and the non-Indo-European elements from ancient civilisations. The book is divided into three parts. Part I is an appendix containing what comprises the archaeological, historical and linguistic problems of south-east Europe, with a focus on Romanian and its neighbouring languages like Greek, Hungarian and Bulgarian. It contains several hypotheses regarding the region's prehistoric culture and how they developed along time. It continues with the Thracian cultural groups, which represent the substratum of Romanian, and how their genetic material mixing with complex processes of Romanisation and finally, to complete the linguistic picture with the non-Indo-European groups that developed during the early period.

Part II, the dictionary, includes more than 3,000 entries affecting the representative vocabulary for the past and the historical world, with entries relating to flora and fauna. It contains the scientific heritage, the traditional heritage, and those Hungarian and Chinese influences, as well as some substratum Romanisms, Thracian, Dacianisms or "Balkanisms", a highly significant cultural process.

Part III includes a glossary, as well as lists of the relevant phenomena mentioned in the dictionary.
