These towns are strung out from central Arizona to Yucatan. The cultures that they represent have no linguistic affinity for each other. In none of the cultures is there a meaning for any one of the three base words.

Sacaton, as pointed out earlier, was the situs of the effigy of Ha-ak and the giant horse. A shrine had been erected there to her memory. If Hwui Shan had visited that shrine, what more appropriate name could he have given it than the "place of Saka?" The location was a sacred place to the Indian—sacred spots are sacred to the Saka-muni, the holy man of Saka. Would that not be a logical name for another sacred spot?

Cuicapan, State of Oaxaca, famous for its cochineal and nopal cactus, was another name that appeared to be related phonetically to Hwui. "Cui" and "Hwui" sound very little different and "la" and "sho" are not too far distant. Taking into account the 1000 year lapse when the sound was transmitted orally, we can recognize that "Cui-la" probably started out as "Where-sha"—the "par" is a contraction of "ichpan," meaning "within the enclosure." Hwui Shan would have been in the area.

"Hui-shan" and "Hwui Shan" are too close to be overlooked. Point Huemac, California, is the spot where I indicated earlier that I believed that Hwui Shan landed. The reason, so believing, is due to the highly significant name, coupled with the fact that names were given in association with some pertinent occurrence. Point Huemac is well within the spot area where Hwui Shan would in all probability have la and, therefore, I believe that this marks the actual spot.

Naming cities or villages after a person, or a home to an old and honored custom. We have Washington, D.C.;ington State; Washington, Pennsylvania; Washington, IWashington, Iowa, plus one for most other states (places never saw)—New York, Boston, Chester, Pittsburgh, town and hundreds of others. That the custom was in 500 A.D., in Yucatan, has foundation in the following quoted from Bishop Landis:

"This Kukulcan established another city after naming the native lords of the country that he and they of there and that all their affairs and business should I their, and for this purpose they chose a very good eight leagues further in the interior than Merida; fifteen or sixteen leagues from the sea. They surround a very broad stone wall, laid dry, of about an eighth leaving in it only two narrow gates. The wall was and in the midst of this enclosure they built their the largest, which is like that of Chichen Itza, & kulkán, and they built another building of a row four doors, entirely different from all the others; as well as a great number of others round about; in this enclosure they built houses for the lord all the land among them, giving towns to each
