ABSTRACT

Acculturation may influence health behaviors, yet mechanisms underlying its effect are not well understood. In this study, we describe relationships between acculturation and health behaviors among low-income housing residents, and examine whether these relationships are mediated by social and contextual factors. Residents of 20 low-income housing sites in the Boston metropolitan area completed surveys that assessed acculturative characteristics, social/contextual factors, and health behaviors. A composite acculturation scale was developed using latent class analysis, resulting in four distinct acculturative groups. Path analysis was used to examine interrelationships between acculturation, health behaviors, and social/contextual factors, specifically self-reported social ties, social support, stress, material hardship, and discrimination.

Of the 828 respondents, 69% were born outside of the US. Less acculturated groups exhibited healthier dietary practices and were less likely to smoke than more acculturated groups. Acculturation had a direct effect on diet and smoking, but not physical activity. Acculturation also showed an indirect effect on diet through its relationship with material hardship.

Our finding that material hardship mediated the relationship between acculturation and diet suggests the need to explicate the significant role of financial resources in interventions seeking to promote healthy diets among low-income immigrant groups. Future research should examine these social and contextual mediators using larger, population-based samples, preferably with longitudinal data.

1. Introduction

Acculturation has been defined as the process by which the attitudes, values, beliefs and behaviors of one culture are adopted by an individual from another (Clark and Hodges, 1998). Often, acculturation is equated with language proficiency and preference, as well as generational status (Abraido-Lanza et al., 2005; Lopez-Class et al., 2011). Acculturation has traditionally been viewed as a process of assimilation, which assumes a unidirectional, linear trajectory in which immigrants adopt the “dominant culture” (Berry and Sam, 1997). More recently, there has been acknowledgment that acculturation is a multidimensional, reciprocal and dynamic process (Abraido-Lanza et al., 2006; Lara et al., 2005; Lopez-Class et al., 2011) that is affected by societal structures and policies (Abraido-Lanza et al., 2006; Lopez-Class et al., 2011). The concept of acculturation has been criticized because it is commonly conceived as an individual-level factor, potentially masking the societal-level factors that prompt, co-exist, or are the result of immigration experiences (Acovedo-Garcia et al., 2012).

Nonetheless, a large body of literature has examined relationships between acculturation, health status (Kaplan et al., 2004; Singh and Subhash, 2002) and health behavior (Abraido-Lanza et al., 2005; Andrieva et al., 2011; Ayala et al., 2008). Increased time spent in the United States (US) has consistently been associated with increased physical activity, presumably because of changes in cultural norms (Abraido-Lanza et al., 2005; Lara et al., 2005; Perez-Encarnilla and Putnik, 2007). However, acculturation
