

Crime Pattern Theory

According to this theory crime happens when the activity space of a victim intersects with the activity space of an offender.

A person's activity space consists of locations in everyday life, for example home, work, school, shopping areas, entertainment areas etc. These personal locations are also called nodes.

The course or route a person takes to and from these nodes are called personal paths.

Personal paths connect with various nodes creating a perimeter. This perimeter is a person's awareness space.

Activity space: Describes an area of activity where crime can occur.

Crime generators: A location that attracts a large number of people without any premeditated intention to commit a crime but the opportunity is too good to pass up, for example a shopping mall.

Crime attractors: A location that attracts offenders because of its known opportunity for crime.
