

OF ECONOMIC SURVEYS of the world and of the poorer countries especially, there are none. But the peripatetic Director of Stanford University's Institute for Communications Research has written here the closest approximation to a survey of world communication conditions that can be found. The analogy should go further: As economics is to wealth, as political science to power, so communications are to enlightenment; communications development should be treated like economic development or political development.

But Schramm's work there is a treatise on a special part of the problem of who possesses the means of information, how they use them and with what effects they are employed. He analyzes the important literature in international communications, reflects upon his extensive study tours of the world, gathers the fruits of many a conference—none of which fatiguing experiences has dulled his sunny disposition—and answers the question: who does not possess information now can they get it, what will be the effects of it when they do?

The correlation of levels of mass media communications with those of economic development is positive and high. Schramm concludes that "the flow of news among nations is free, but it is unbalanced, with heavy coverage of a few highly developed countries and light coverage of many less-developed ones, and that, in some cases at least, it tends to ignore important events and to distort the reality it presents." Travel is directly weighted against international communications. If, as it shows, only nine of 253 items of an AP newswire on a given day get to the readers of a Wisconsin metropolitan daily, it is even more dismal to note that the news agency itself, along with the four other great news agencies of the world, will gather in only faintest traces of reality from the great majority of nations of the world. Turned the other way around, the news agencies will of course report back to those countries a highly distorted picture of the rest of the world—concentrating largely on what is happening

Mass Media and National Development: The Role of Information in the Developing Countries

by Wilbur Schramm

in the USA, USSR, Britain, and France.

The countries started for information are given a worded, tape-recorded, and security diet. When UNESCO decided to set up a minimum and immediate target for multiplicity of mass communication facilities around the world, it prescribed 10 daily newspapers per 100 inhabitants, four radio receivers, two electric sets, and two television receivers. A hundred States fell below the minimum in all respects, with two-thirds of the world's people. Only the radio sector has shown a rapid enough rate of advance to carry the world beyond the minimum level within the next decade.

The improvement is concentrated in the cities excessively, with the rural masses often far behind in facilities and information. Yet the country folk flood the cities as they do in the USA, bringing their acerbity distorted sense of the larger community and a fairly complete lack of information.

Of what use are the mass media? The mass media touch of the greater community, says Krasdenusky from Africa. They help create the needed ties of community, reports Hahnberg from the Peruvian hacienda. In Asia's view, from two First Indian Villages, they smooth the transition and pave the road for change, while in David Turner's expression from Near Eastern studies they act as a great rapid multiplier of contacts, like large-scale assembly-line industry, even in poor countries.

Professor Schramm also sets forth in plain and simple terms what the mass media are potentially capable of doing. They can widen horizons, focus attention, raise aspirations and create a climate for development. They can help only indirectly to change strongly held attitudes or valued practices, but they can affect attitudes lightly held and channelize stronger beliefs. They can feed richer material into the interpersonal dialogue that must carry much of the international flow in less technically developed areas. They can confer status upon those who are trying to lead and those who are trying to follow the news leads. They can introduce new dimensions to problems. They can enforce social norms, and help form habits. They can help substantially in all types of education and training.

To provide for these idealized objectives requires organization and personnel. Schramm offers a scheme
