Nancy Wellington Bookhart,2023-10-10 The Aestheticization of History and the Butterfly Effect Visual Arts Series introduces the audience to philosophical concepts that broach the beginning of the history of Western thought in Plato and Aristotle to that of more modern thought in the theoretician Jacques Rancière in which the main conceptual framework of this anthology is predicated The introduction is mainly concerned with Rancière's concept of the distribution of the sensible which is the arrangement of things accessible to our senses what we experience in real time and space compartmentalization and categorization of all things These things do not just involve tangible items but audible speech written language and visibilities Rancière's theory of the regimes of art is undertaken as the unfolding of the distribution Such is evoked in the various genres of visual art forms from two dimensional paintings to three dimensional sculptures and architectures Understanding the aesthetic regime of art is crucial for grasping how art performs time travel One way of understanding this phenomenon is in terms of embodied philosophy imbued vis vis art forms which are subsequently challenged by contemporary artists The contributing essays examine these reiterations reevaluations performances Aesthetics is a term deriving from the 18th century European Enlightenment It is here that aesthetics as the study of beauty is probed for its political potential after the failure of the French Revolution Many major thinkers during this period signed on to the aesthetic moment recognizing that Reason in its present state failed to develop humankind beyond barbarism J E B Stuart's statue is part of an equestrian theme that approximates the Western canon of power and class in the pursuit of domination But such power and domination will be dethroned in the restaging of history and the redistribution of said canon This reimagining of the form not only alters perception but constitutes a new narrative
