

Writing and Composing in a Second Language

... writing will be used as a generic term to refer to all of the various activities that involve transferring thought to paper. Writing that focuses primarily on the conventions of language form, i.e., grammatical or lexical structure, will be termed transcription. The term composition will refer to the skills involved in effectively developing and communicating an idea or making a point.

(Dvorak 1986: 145)

INTRODUCTION

Some have referred to reading as the forgotten skill in language instruction. We suspect, however, that writing is probably the area in which language classes offer the learner the least. Think about your own language learning experiences. How much writing (that is, transcribing and composing) did you do? Answer the following questions about writing in general, and about writing in a second language in particular, based on your own experiences.

  - a. The same person who writes them is the one who has to read them.
  - b. The writer and the reader are presumably different people.
  - c. They all have words on a page.
  - d. They really don't have much in common.
  - e. Other _____
2. In what ways do the above writing samples differ? Indicate all that apply.
  - a. length
  - b. the intended audience
  - c. purpose
  - d. handwritten versus typewritten
  - e. other _____
