Issues in Preventing the Spread of AIDS

By Sherie Merman

The only realistic way to halt the spread of the AIDS virus is to teach people how to avoid it. Everyone needs to learn how you catch it and how you don't. Everyone. Men, women, blacks, whites, gays, lesbians, blacks, latinos, Asians, children, teenagers, adults, seniors. As people gain a better understanding of the disease, their hysteria and fears will diminish.

It sounds simple, yet anyone who is trying to get the facts to the public will tell you what an overwhelming task they are engaged in. Morris Prince of the Francis & Taylor Foundation is typical of the health educators who are pushing themselves to exhaustion to reach as many people as they can. Prince says, "I may sleep dead, but I'm not gonna give up."

In this article, we will look at the factors and the issues that slow down the education process. We also will see forces at work which ultimately will triumph over the deadly AIDS virus.

Homophobia

It was a nasty trick of fate that chose a gay white man to be the first American to develop AIDS. In most other countries of the world, the disease has largely leveled the heterosexual population. If that same fate happened here, we might be years ahead in research to find an effective treatment and in teaching people how to resist infection. Unfortunately, the symptoms were first identified in young, white, male homosexuals. So it became a gay white man's disease. As Randy Shilts points out in And The Band Played On, early guidelines for dealing with the epidemic were "Don't offend the gays and don't offend the homophobes."

Drug addicts were the next group to get sick. Ruth Schoonover, Hotline Coordinator at AIDS Project Los Angeles (APLA), paraphrased the general attitude of the first years: "Just 'junkies' and 'faggots' are affected, no who cares?" Very few cared, except for a handful of conscientious physicians and nurses, and several public health officials at the Centers for Disease Control (CDC). These health care professionals, as Schoonover puts it, "simply saw a disease to fight."

Many who became ill received inadequate care. There was little sympathy and even less money available to help them. There was no money for research. Michael Gottlieb, M.D., who is credited with identifying the Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) based on the unusual but similar symptoms of five young male patients in Los Angeles, carried on his research for two years with no funding because there was none. Nor were there funds for education.

Even the gay community denied the severity of the problem. Some homosexuals saw AIDS as part of a heterosexual plot to deny them their sexual freedom. They were reluctant to circulate information about the disease for fear of political repercussions. Some gay leaders, however, argued for unity and research funds. Many people with AIDS fought rejection, fear, and isolation, trying to make people understand and care about those who were wrestling with the fatal illness.

Eventually, the number of deaths became too great to ignore. Physicians who were providing care, along with public health specialists who realized the immensity of the crisis, pressed hard for action. Finally, things began to happen. Michael Gottlieb got his first research grant from the National Institute of Health in 1983, two years after he first applied for funds.

Because the grant wasn't big enough, he and Marcus Conant, M.D., of the University of California at San Francisco, persuaded Willie Brown, then Speaker of the State Assembly, to allocate the first $1 million in state aid for what has become the multi-million dollar University of California AIDS Research Program.

During the summer of 1985, volunteers at APLA contacted Elizabeth Taylor for one of the most helpful things we can do: to devote a great deal of time and energy to the first Commitment To Life, a spectacular fundraising event. Through her efforts, many volunteers joined an Entertainment Support Committee.

National media coverage of the event legitimized the work of AIDS support groups that were beginning to form all over the country. These groups offered services to AIDS patients and their families. Many began to disseminate information through lectures, group presentations, and printed materials.

The death of Rock Hudson, in October 1985, provided much-needed impetus to the still inadequate attempts to fight the disease. Hudson was a man whom people liked and admired. By admitting that he had AIDS, he forced people to see the human side of the illness. At last, the government mobilized and made more dollars available for research and education.

The Government

While government funding is essential to underwrite the cost of AIDS education programs, government involvement is a mixed blessing. eager to demonstrate their commitment to their constituents and to ensure their reelection, many elected officials bring a "me-first" perspective to their positions on AIDS. This attitude is evident when government commissioners censor the AIDS education materials they are asked to approve.

Several years ago, L.A. CARES issued "Mother's Handy Sex Guide," an illustrated manual that criticized safe sex. It was an attempt to make safe practices more appealing to sexually active gay men. The guide was successful in reaching its target audience.

In October, 1987, Senator Helms initiated an amendment to prohibit the allocation of funds "to provide AIDS education, information, or prevention materials and activities that promote or encourage directly or indirectly homosexual activities." The amendment would have prevented the use of federal funds for educational materials intended to communicate information on safer sex to gay and bisexual men, says John Mortimer, Director of Government Affairs at APLA.

Thanks to the placing of 1,000 phone calls by members of APLA's Citizen Network, the congressional appropriation conference made significant changes in the Helms Amendment to specifically indicate their intent not to prohibit all such targeted materials.

APLA's "Safe Sex Guidelines," developed late in 1985, were revised when the state Board of Community Colleges "OK'd" new regulations for AIDS education materials are currently under consideration.
