

Structure of high altitude

There is a vertical gradient of temperature, precipitation, and wind speed, as well as a gradient of soil depth and soil moisture. The higher the altitude, the more extreme the conditions. The most extreme conditions are found at the highest altitudes, where the temperature is below freezing, precipitation is low, and wind speed is high. The conditions at high altitude are so extreme that many plants and animals cannot survive there.

Alpine conditions are so cold and windy that many of the plants that grow here are similar to those of the tundra.

HOW MONTANE HABITATS WORK

As mountains rise to their highest peaks, conditions become too harsh for forests to grow. Instead, grassy alpine tundra and grasslands take to the top and even live at the highest elevations. In the tundra, the coldness of the winter is offset by the warmth of the summer. The tundra is a high-altitude ecosystem found in mountainous regions.
