

Rey, S.J.; Franklin, R.S. (eds.) (2022): Handbook of Spatial Analysis in the Social Sciences

For spatial planning, new and manifold opportunities are currently arising for analysing spatial structures and processes. The abundance of new geospatial data and methods, however, is also challenging researchers and practitioners. Data and methods need to be carefully selected to suit specific questions and communication needs. While these digital technologies are promising as they provide “greater intellectual heft to planning through rich information and more rigorous analysis” (Goodspeed 2016: 18), they are also perceived as black boxes and expert systems with limited capabilities to connect to the knowledge of others. Making digital technologies useful for planning requires a certain degree of transparency. In particular, it has to be clear whose knowledge the technologies contain and which new planning practices are needed to incorporate them (Goodspeed 2016). Hence, planning research requires discourse and capacity building to enhance geospatial data literacy and knowledge on the opportunities and limitations of available methods. Here, the “Handbook of Spatial Analysis in the Social Sciences”, edited by Sergio J. Rey and Rachel S. Franklin, should be considered a highly valuable contribution.

The Handbook’s editors introduce the topic of spatial analysis by referring to the two substantial turns in the social sciences, i.e. a spatial and a computational turn. The former involved Geographic Information Systems (GIS) and science introducing concepts of spatial connections, proximity or place to better understand social processes. The second turn is described as a revolution in which new sub-fields of social science emerged that employ computational methods and novel data. Given these dynamics, the editors argue for a need to enhance knowledge exchange between spatial and social scientists. Thus, they understand the aim of the Handbook as being to outline foundations and structure across the spectrum of spatial analytics and, equally important, to also deliver conversational entry points. The book aims to attract a readership of researchers in social sciences, including geography and geography-adjacent fields.

To allow for such a broad scope and readership, the book is structured into four parts on “Theoretical Foundations”, “Methods”, “Applications” and “Emerging Challenges”, uniting about 50 contributors. The first contribution introduces the science of geographic information (Barbara Buttenfield) starting with the roots of Geographic Information Systems in landscape architecture and cartography, leading to critical perspectives, e.g. on public participation
