

Factors influencing patients' length of stay

YINGXIN LIU, MIKE PHILLIPS, AND JIM CODDE

Yingxin Liu is a research consultant and Mike Phillips is a senior lecturer in the Department of Epidemiology and Biostatistics, School of Public Health, Curtin University of Technology. Jim Codde is a director in Epidemiology and Analytical Services, Health Department of Western Australia.

Abstract

This study was conducted to evaluate the ability of AN-DRG version 3.1 to predict variation in patients' length of stay in hospital (LOS) and identify other factors that can influence the LOS by using routinely collected hospital morbidity data. A total of 18 DRGs that comprised 4,589 episodes were analysed. Multiple regression was used to model length of stay as a function of a number of independent variables. Overall only 37.6% of variation in mean length of stay could be explained. DRGs predicted 30% of the total variation. Other factors such as age, payment classification, source of referral, specialty of doctor, and ethnic group also influenced patient length of stay. It was concluded that the limited explanation was a consequence of a lack of a better indicator of severity within DRGs.

Introduction

With rapidly rising health care costs, governments and other major funders of health care services have been searching for mechanisms to control expenditure and evaluate the efficiency of health care delivery. The pursuit of technical efficiency in the health care service has become an important objective. Diagnosis Related Groups (DRGs) have been developed as a part of this process.

Australian National Diagnosis Related Groups (AN-DRG) classification is revised frequently to maintain its validity. AN-DRG version 3.1 addressed some shortcomings of earlier versions, but there is still heterogeneity within DRGs due to differences in complications and comorbidities and other clinical and non-clinical factors. At present, AN-DRGs have been replaced by Australian Refined Diagnosis Related Groups (AR-DRG), which improves the method of calculating a patient's clinical complexity level (Commonwealth Department of Health and Family Services, 1998).

DRG development is aided through statistical analysis to ensure that the classification of DRGs maximises clinical meaningfulness and maintains intra-group homogeneity. As part of this analysis, length of stay (LOS), the number of bed days per inpatient episode, is often used to indicate the level of hospital resources consumed (Berki et al., 1984). Moreover, it is one of the parameters used to approximate the level of resource consumption for a particular episode of care and as an indicator of homogeneity (Commonwealth Department of Human Services and Health, 1995). An analysis of the determinants of length of stay, therefore, may provide useful information for assessing the quality of DRG classification and improving the efficiency of the delivery of health care.

This study explored DRGs and other factors that potentially influence length of stay in a large urban teaching hospital in Western Australia. Its aim was to evaluate the ability of AN-DRG version 3.1 to explain variation in length of stay and determine whether there are differences in length of stay among categories defined by
