

logue of the Marxist complaint was pointed and clear; likewise his distinction between ethical and political judgments in the design of social science projects. Wax's value orientations seem close to those of the Camelot staff, and we can be grateful for his debunking of several of the myths about the project that have crept—or barged?—into the literature.

Wax's emphasis on care in design and attention to ethical considerations in planning is always worth repeating. I can't share his and Deitchman's pessimism about the feasibility of other attempts—though better planned and executed than Project Camelot—to utilize quality social science in shaping foreign policy. Who knows? Maybe good social science could even make for a more enlightened as well as a more technically competent Department of State! One must have hope.

REVIEW OF

The Elusive Phenomena. Fritz J. Roethlisberger, 1977, Cambridge, Harvard Univ. Press
by WILLIAM FOOTE WHYTE

William Foote Whyte is Professor of Industrial and Labor Relations at Cornell University. I am grateful to Conrad M. Arensberg, George C. Homans, and Henry A. Landsberger for criticisms of the first draft of this paper. They bear no responsibility for the conclusions I have drawn.

This posthumously published intellectual autobiography by one of the pioneers in the field of organizational behavior stirred up vivid memories for me. I was not as close to Fritz Roethlisberger as the reader might assume from this book—at one point (p. 311) the author writes "speaking for myself and also for Bill Whyte . . ."—but I did know him and some of those who were principal actors in his life also had a major impact upon mine.

I first met Fritz and also those principal actors when I was a Junior Fellow at Harvard from 1936 to 1940. I never had a serious discussion with him during this period, but, since we had a number of friends in common, I encountered him from time to time in social groups. In that setting, it was not easy to get to know him.

Most of these encounters were before publication of Management and the Worker (1939), and, although I gathered from the comments of others that Roethlisberger had been doing some important work, you would never have got the impression from listening to him in group situations. He talked little and mainly listened—sympathetically and with a twinkle in his eye but nevertheless rather passively. Eliot Chapple once said to me that Fritz Roethlisberger had the lowest dominance score of anyone he had ever encountered. I don't know whether this was based upon measurements on the interaction chronograph or on impressions, but in any case the characterization seemed accurate.

I can recall only one time that I was alone with Fritz. Sometime in the 1950s he came to Cornell for a meeting, and we took an afternoon off so that I could drive him around the countryside and talk with him about his work and mine.

In my Harvard period, I came to know some of the people who had major influence on his work and intellectual development. For one semester, I met weekly with Elton Mayo in a small seminar including George Homans. As I have pointed out in the appendix of Street Corner Society (1955), Lawrence J. Henderson, Chairman of the Society of Fellows, had a major impact upon me as he did upon Roethlisberger. Beyond those Society dinners, I took his Pareto seminar and his course in Concrete Sociology. Conrad M. Arensberg was then a Junior Fellow, and it was through him that I made the shift from economics to what I thought was going to be social anthropology and which turned out at least in the formal Ph.D. sense to be sociology. Through Arensberg, I met Eliot Chapple. When I arrived at Harvard in 1936, W. Lloyd Warner, who had a major role in shaping the research methods and design for the Western Electric studies, had left for the University of Chicago, taking the voluminous data of the Yankee City studies with him. In 1940 I went to the University of Chicago for formal graduate work primarily because Warner was there.

This was an exciting period at Harvard, a time of intellectual ferment. Warner's Yankee City studies had shifted the attention of social anthropologists from primitive societies to modern industrial communities, and Arensberg and Chapple who had participated in that research program (with Chapple being Warner's chief lieutenant while the fieldwork went on), had gone on to develop their interaction framework. One evening at a party Chapple turned up with the first primitive model of his interaction chronograph.

This was also a time when a new field of study was being born. Like Roethlisberger, I date the beginnings of research in what was then called human relations in industry and now has come to be called organizational behavior to the Western Electric researches. Other sociologists prefer to trace the beginnings back to Max Weber, but, while it is certainly true that Weber's work preceded the Western
