Abstract

Introduction

Management of thoracolumbar fractures remains controversial in the literature. The primary aims of this study were to assess different levels of fixation with respect to radiological outcomes in terms of fracture reduction and future loss of correction.

Methods

This is a single center, retrospective study. Fifty-five patients presenting with thoracolumbar fractures between January 2012 and December 2015 were analyzed in the study. The levels of fixation were divided in 3 groups, 1 vertebra above and 1 below the fracture (1/1), 2 above and 2 below (2/2), and 2 above and 1 below (2/1).

Results

The most common mechanism was high fall injury and the most common vertebra L1. Burst fractures were the ones with the highest incidence. The 2/2 fixation achieved the best reduction of the fracture but with no statistical significance. The correction is maintained better by the 2/2 fixation but there is no statistical difference compared to the other fixations. Insertion of screws at the fracture level did not improve outcomes.

Conclusion

The data of this study identified a trend towards better radiological outcomes for fracture reduction and maintenance of the correction in the 2/2 fixations. However these results are not statistically significant. Future multicenter prospective clinical trials are needed in order to agree on the ideal management and method of fixation for thoracolumbar fractures.

Introduction

The majority of vertebral fractures in the axial skeleton occur in the thoracolumbar spine.¹ The thoracolumbar area is the transition of the rigid thoracic spine into the mobile lumbar spine and it is considered biomechanically the weakest part of the spine. This characteristic makes it vulnerable to increased stresses and injuries.^{2,3} Thoracolumbar injuries are usually the result of high energy trauma like motor vehicle accidents or falls from a height.¹

Numerous thoracolumbar fracture classifications have been proposed that aim to help in diagnosis, guide treatment and help with communication. Amongst the most significant are the ones proposed by Dennis, Magerl, the Thoracolumbar Injury Classification System (TLICS) by Vaccaro and the AOSpine Thoracolumbar spine injury classification system by Vaccaro.⁴⁻⁷ The Denis classification system introduced a modern concept on spinal stability, the 3-column theory. CT and MRI scans later revealed a more complex stability mechanism and rendered the Denis Classification as an incomplete model however it is still thought to have some use in modern practice. The latest AOSpine Thoracolumbar spine injury classification system (Table 1) combines the strengths of the Magerl and TLICS in terms of mor-
