

Beyond Genera Palmarum: progress and prospects in palm systematics

WILLIAM J. BAKER FLS* and JOHN DRANSFIELD FLS

Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew, Richmond, Surrey, TW9 3AB, UK

Received 30 October 2015; revised 2 February 2016; accepted for publication 10 February 2016

The systematic biology of the palm family (Arecaceae) is probably better known than that of any other tropical plant family of comparable size. As a result, the palms are now regarded as a model group for tropical rain forest research. Ten years ago, the first phylogenetic classification of palms was established as a foundation for the second edition of the palm systematic synthesis, Genera Palmarum (GP2), which was published in 2008. Here, we review progress in palm systematics since GP2, summarizing the latest developments in an updated palm classification and schematic phylogenetic tree. To date, the palms comprise 181 genera and c. 2600 species. In just 8 years, six new genera and 200 new species have been described, whereas eight genera have been sunk into synonymy. This reflects the highly dynamic nature of systematic discovery of palms at both forest and phylogenetic frontiers. Palm phylogenetics is a vibrant field, with new trees being generated and utilized in increasingly innovative and ambitious ways. Existing understanding of relationships among the five subfamilies has been confirmed and deep nodes in the subfamilies are crystallizing, especially in subfamilies Arecoidae and Coryphoideae. We conclude that palm systematic knowledge is far from complete and that tools, such as GP2, only stimulate further scientific research and discovery. Despite recent advances, however, many aspects of the palm Tree of Life still remain scarcely known. The vast datasets that the phylogenomic revolution is now bringing to bear on palms promise to elucidate many of these unknowns. The ultimate goal, a species-level phylogenetic tree for palms, is now coming within reach. © 2016 The Linnean Society of London, Botanical Journal of the Linnean Society, 2016, 182, 207–233

ADDITIONAL KEYWORDS: Arecaceae – biodiversity – classification – next-generation sequencing – Palmae – phylogenetics – phylogenomics – plant taxonomy – rainforest.

INTRODUCTION

Systematics advances in increments, with each step intended as a successive approximation towards the optimal solution. Palms (Arecaceae) are no exception to this trend. Such has been the success of the palm systematic endeavour that few, if any, tropical plant families of comparable size rival palms in terms of fundamental systematic resources (Govaerts & Dransfield, 2005; Dransfield et al., 2008b; Baker et al., 2009; Baker & Couvreur, 2013a; Govaerts et al., 2015). As a result, palms are now widely regarded as a model group for tropical plant research (Eiserhardt et al., 2011b; Couvreur & Baker, 2013). How have palms, which are notoriously difficult to study, become so well known? Put simply, over decades and centuries, palms have attracted specialists who are drawn to their economic importance (Badick & Beck, 1990), their keystone role in ecosystems (Eiserhardt et al., 2011b; ter Steege et al., 2013) or perhaps merely to their charisma and the scientific challenge that they present. The work of generations of such palm specialists has laid the foundations of palm biology today.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF GENERA PALMARUM

Following the remarkable contributions of 19th and early 20th century innovators, such as Martius, Griffith, Blume, J. D. Hooker, Beccari and Burret (summarized in Dransfield et al., 2008b), the modern palm systematic era dawned with the work of Harold E. Moore Jr. (1917–1980). From his base in the L. H. Bailey Hortorium at Cornell University, Moore became the leading light in palm research from the 1950s to the 1970s. An avid fieldworker, he explored for palms across the globe, studying all but 12 of the
